History AutoCAD initially ran on MS-DOS and CP/M systems. In the 1990s it was ported to Windows 3.1 and the X Window System. At its introduction, AutoCAD was a commercial application in which users paid monthly or yearly subscriptions and paid for each AutoCAD license (subscription). The user did not have an ownership interest in the software. In 1995, Autodesk changed the licensing model to a system of perpetual licenses; however, the user is still required to pay for the AutoCAD software each time a new version of AutoCAD is released. On May 21, 2009, Autodesk announced it would begin offering a free personal-use version of AutoCAD 2009 and later versions under the terms of the Open Technology Initiative. On October 1, 2013, Autodesk announced a revision of the licensing model to a perpetual license for the purpose of enabling new users to obtain a free, personal-use version of AutoCAD and other Autodesk products. In June 2010, Autodesk announced that the AutoCAD 2011 Professional edition, AutoCAD LT 2010, AutoCAD 360, and AutoCAD Map 3D 2011 would no longer be sold to new users but would be perpetual licensed, effective December 1, 2010. Users of the previous licensed versions of AutoCAD did not have to purchase a new license in order to continue using the software. They continued to receive a new yearly subscription to get the latest version of AutoCAD. AutoCAD 2019 The new AutoCAD app for iPad and Android is available as part of the subscription model. As of September 1, 2012, it was reported that after December 31, 2015, AutoCAD LT users can only use the iPad app, as the desktop version will no longer be available. AutoCAD 2013 can only be used on the desktop version. Features The basic features of AutoCAD are functions that can be found in other CAD programs. They include commands to define a new drawing, edit the existing one, view the drawing in 2D or 3D, dimension drawing, documentation, and displaying data. Drawing functions AutoCAD functions (extensions) allow the user to be more specific in the commands he or she is running. Commands are divided into two groups: default and custom. Default commands are the same as those in other CAD programs. Custom commands are specific to AutoCAD and are
