, Reused, and Replicated July 3, 2007 I'm a quick typist. I like text. The nice new stock is feeling of this keyboard, and is a good fit for me. OwlCat Keyboard - left side, save and reference, right side Soon, I'll have a new keyboard that looks like this. The real luxury of paper technology is not just that I can type on it and leave it on the desk, but that I can snip it to pieces if necessary. I can abandon it if I have no need of it. That's the premise behind PaperClip Creations — a company that makes project folders, because they are recyclable, not just paper. And they are nice to open. Paper that wraps around you can be laid out easily. Leave it. Send it. They also happen to make them very well. That was not true, I knew, until I saw the funky, new, retro design of a paper folding basket in Herman Pink's office. It arrived in my mailbox last week with a blurb from the manufacturer: "As a researcher, if you want a group of colleagues to brainstorm ideas or just get together to think through a solution to a problem, then a paper folding technique makes a great meeting space... As a curator, if you're organising a conference, the time and effort you save by reusing and retrieving the individual papers instead of packing away a pile of loose papers... As a presenter, paper folding can be used to work out a clever angle or to respond to a question. It provides a fast and clean method for you to dispose of a paper after presenting and return it to a different form once you're done presenting" And so it dawned on me that I've been littering papers all over the place! Even some of the niche accessories that I use. Adding to the pile: the naming conventions for my computers led me to a filing cabinet of small notebooks. Junior Junior Senior This one's a Junior At least I keep them together now. This is their own brand of pink filofax. It comes with a bioshield. And a bioshield bag. And a bioshield pouch. And this is a view in the back.
