However, the cost and size of these scanners make it challenging to send them into space—that's why we're currently experimenting with a cheaper alternative called a laser radar. The results are impressive. "Laser radar is an emerging technology that uses the human eye as a receiver. It projects an ultrasonic beam of light, called a pulse, at a target, then records the time it takes for the beam to return," says Robert Woodard, assistant professor in the Department of Electrical and Computer Engineering at the University of California, Santa Barbara. Laser radar isn't as precise as a lidar scanner, but if you want something quick, precise, and relatively cheap, it's the way to go. The simplest laser radar is based on the Doppler effect, which is used to measure how fast something is moving away or toward you. "Everything has a Doppler shift," says Manuel Lozano, assistant professor of electrical and systems engineering at the University of California, San Diego. "The shifts of the frequency of the light that is emitted and is reflected are different depending on how fast the object is moving away or toward the laser." For example, you can do this with a normal flashlight. If you shine it into the middle of your living room, you'll notice that the light coming back looks different than the light you emitted. This is due to the fact that the room is moving away from the light. But how can you use this simple method to get an accurate 3D map of the world? Well, it's actually pretty easy. You
