Washington (CNN) -- McCain's campaign on Sunday canceled a rally for Tuesday in Virginia because of continuing snow in the state. On Saturday morning, McCain canceled a rally for Tuesday in South Carolina because of the snow. "Because of the ongoing weather conditions, we are rescheduling the Virginia rally and will post a new date as soon as it is rescheduled," said Jason Miller, the campaign's senior communications adviser. Campaign aides had been planning to reschedule the rally in Virginia to accommodate snowbound voters in the region. McCain's campaign had cited the weather conditions as a major reason for canceling a rally in Green Bay, Wisconsin, on Saturday. And McCain had planned to give a speech in Arizona on Sunday. The snowstorm, as it is being described in the Washington area, fell on a weekend that had been set aside for campaigning. The snow was predicted to be heavy and severe, Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia said Sunday. Warner warned of landslides and strong winds, according to the Associated Press. Warner and others said that the consequences of canceling a rally could be significant, given that McCain now has a significant lead in Virginia, according to a survey done earlier this month. The Republican candidate also leads in South Carolina, according to a new survey. McCain and Democratic rival Barack Obama remained in Washington Sunday. CNN's Paula Newton and Lisa Desjardins contributed to this story.
