In particular, the present invention relates to multiple-pass memory systems that can dynamically re-allocate memory storage from one access unit to another based on a changing number of access units. Multiple-pass memory systems are used to address access unit size limitations, for example, when using a memory cell that has a write-once-read-many (WORM) characteristic. In such a WORM memory cell, a first pass is used to write the cell, and a second pass is used to read back the information from the cell. In conventional WORM memory systems, a fixed amount of memory storage is used for each access unit. That is, a given amount of storage space is allocated to each data unit of a first access unit. Such systems can fail to meet the storage demands of certain applications
